Mouse without Borders is a small but ingenious application that can be used to transfer files between computers much more easily. The idea behind the app is, as the name suggests, having your mouse cursor, as well as keyboard, shared between more computers. The clipboard is also shared, meaning you'll be able to transfer elements between connected machines in a jiffy. A wizard will guide you through Now, if you're scared the process is complicated, you should know it's not any different from the wizard one has to follow when adjusting TeamViewer for use. The app will explain the basic principle behind it, then proceed to ask for other computer names and a security code for each one, both of which will lead to the actual linking process. As far as the number of connected computers is concerned, eight is the maximum number, of course, provided you decide to opt for the two-row option. The application is snappy and does offer exactly what is advertised. It's an ingenious way of facilitating file transfer between two or more computers. Plenty of options for adjustment! The application, despite having simple functions, includes a vast number of adjustable settings. One can activate a shared clipboard, hide logos and cursors at the screen edge, validate remote machine IP addresses, block screen saver or mouse in a certain area on the screen. Key mappings are also a thing. Actions such as switching between machines, showing settings forms, custom screen captures, and even exiting the application can be triggered by key combinations the user sets in the settings' menu. This particular part of the program can also be completely deactivated. Mouse without Borders is indeed an innovative concept that deals with file transfer and clipboard sharing.
