Q: I am attempting to find the x and y coordinates of a circle and points on it that are within a radius I have a script that is to put a circle on a game object. I also have a script to keep track of it's radius. I am trying to find the X and Y of any circle I want to draw that is within a radius. A: It's probably easier to use a circle collider and track its position in your script: public class

CircleBehaviour : MonoBehaviour { public int radius; void Update () { Vector3 position = transform.position; if (circleCollider) { position -= new Vector3(radius * Mathf.Cos(circleCollider.radius), 0, radius * Mathf.Sin(circleCollider.radius)); } Vector3 size = transform.localScale; position += (new Vector3(size.x, 0, size.z)); transform.position = position; } private Collider circleCollider; }

You can get the collider of any game object with GetComponent() For any circle you can use a circle collider and simply set its radius to whatever radius you want. You can use the built-in function Vector3.Distance to calculate the distance between two vectors (the difference between two circle colliders' positions). Why don't you show up to somewhere in the city, pick a date with some of our lovely ladies and then we will all get together to celebrate? I'm sure we could throw a few invites out there and see who shows up. I'm sure it would be a blast! You got until
