schottky barrier junction), and in which the schottky barrier junction regions are formed in a self-aligning manner. An example of a semiconductor device of the type described is a Schottky barrier rectifier (SBR). The construction of an SBR is described in, for example, "Vacuum," page 90 to 102, March 1986. In an SBR, a Schottky barrier junction is used in an attempt to increase the forward current gain (I.sub.on /I.sub.off). For this purpose, it is necessary to locate the Fermi level position of the two-dimensional electron gas layer confined at the interface between a semiconductor substrate and an n-type semiconductor region which is to serve as a low resistivity region substantially ohmic to the substrate, in a negative direction with respect to that of the Fermi level 0cc13bf012
