Biorelevant extracellular matrix matrices with the protonated/deprotonated charge balance designed in the blood perfusing-like environment. Recently, the control of the solvent for ion-exchange, protonation/deprotonation of biomolecules, has emerged as a method to develop biomimetic matrices that replicate native matrix conditions. This work demonstrated the development of a biorelevant, non-phosphorylated synthetic, collagen-mimetic matrix, which displayed charge effects that are similar to those of native extracellular matrices (ECM). The matrices were produced via triple-helix reconstitution of poly-L-lysine, collagen, and poly-D, L-lysine blocks. These non-phosphorylated matrices were investigated using impedance spectroscopy to determine their charge-related properties. Results suggested that protonation of the matrix shifted the $pK(a)$ of collagen from ~ 5.5 in HEPES buffer (pH 7.4) to ~ 5 in PBS, which is a physiologically relevant protonation shift. Further, the matrices displayed charge effects similar to those of blood perfusion (HEPES, pH 7.4) and collagen-rich tissues (pH $\sim 6-8$) of the body. The primary difference between these two conditions is that the cells in blood perfusion contain $H(+)$ while the collagen-rich tissues contain $Na(+)$ (and other ions). This work aimed to provide data to establish a biorelevant alternative to HEPES (pH 7
