Induction of TCRalpha/beta variable region gene mutations in the thymus of mice treated with N-acetyl-L-cysteine. (1) The use of thymectomy and anti-CD4 mAb to deplete the T cell compartment of N-acetyl-L-cysteine (NAC)-treated B6 mice has helped to define the role of TCR V(alpha) and V(beta) variable region gene family in vivo and have helped to pinpoint the stage of thymic development of T cells in which NAC mediates its effect. Thymectomy or anti-CD4 mAb treatment of normal mice results in increased mutations of the V(alpha) and V(beta) TCR alpha/beta variable region gene family. (2) Thymectomy or treatment of B6 mice with anti-CD4 mAb results in enhanced TCRalpha/beta mutations, whereas treatment of congenic Thy-1.1/Thy-1.2 mice (that express the CD4 marker) with anti-Thy-1.2 mAb results in almost no increase in mutation frequency. (3) The effects of NAC on the generation of TCRalpha/beta mutations in normal mice correlate well with its effects on the TCR locus in thymocytes, suggesting that NAC acts by reducing the viability of thymocytes and/or thymocytes with no-null alleles.
