The project, which is included in the parks master plan in Santa Barbara, is part of the city's multi-pronged effort to phase out the current waste facility that was built in the 1980s. The downtown project, the scope of which is not yet known, is being coordinated with the city and the Metropolitan District Commission (MDC) of Santa Barbara County. The city would be the owner of the facility, which would also include a new sewer line extension, road improvements, and additional green space. Santa Barbara City Manager Rick McLaughlin said the choice of whether to go with a landfill or a solid waste facility comes down to cost and the need for community input. The city has a plan to close the existing landfill by the end of 2017, but other options are also on the table
